A decorated arch over the main street during the Armadale Gala Day, West Lothian, 1907.

Describing the Galas during the 1920s and 1930s local man William Sneddon said: 'At that time on the Gala Day morning there was always a pipe band would come up to Cappers Corner (miner's rows of houses), and play and all the women and men would have a good two or three dances. When the band left to go back down to the school, all the children followed and that was the start of our Gala Day.'

A prize winning arch on the main street of Armadale during the Gala Day, West Lothian, 1909.

In the early years of the Gala Day, the miners constructed huge arches to span the roads in front of the homes of the Queen and her Chief Lady. In following years, various miners who lived in different parts of the town would then compete with each other to build bigger and better arches outside their particular street. The practise of building the large green and boxwood arches has now all but died away.

Crowds line the street to watch the procession during Armadale Gala Day, West Lothian, 1913.

Gala Days were most commonly found in areas of coalmining throughout Scotland. The Star Inn and other buildings along the procession route are flying flags and bunting for the occasion. The procession, involving local schoolchildren, consisted of miners' horses and ponies and a series of decorated carts.

Children play a vital role in the proceedings of the day, often marching in a procession to a local park where a Gala Queen is crowned by a local dignitary. The appearance of the pipe band to lead the procession adds colour and noise to an already eagerly looked forward to occasion.

The burgh band at the Lace Queen Festival, Darvel, Ayrshire, 1951.

During the 1930s and 1950s a day was set aside during the Darvel Holidays for the crowning of a lace queen. This Gala Day was an ideal opportunity for the burgh band to parade around the town.

One resident of Darvel, Morag Ritchie, speaks fondly of her time as the lace queen: 'At the time I was Lace Queen I worked in a sample department... Each lace factory was asked to nominate two employees who had to be resident in Darvel and unmarried. The firm I worked in had some new designs and I was allowed to choose a design and the dresses were made locally. I'll never forget the thrill... And I'll never forget seeing a sea of faces... To me it looked like ten thousand people. A lot of people, mostly I think with Valley connections would come back. It was a day that families got together. I think the town has lost a lot by this being dropped'.

Mussel sellers Mrs Barr and Mrs Murray photographed with their daughters at Inveresk, Musselburgh, Midlothian, c. 1940s - 1950s.

The small girls are dressed in the distinctive striped upturned skirts of the fishwife. The job of gathering and then shelling the mussels was usually given to the fishermen's wives or children. Mussels until recently have mainly been used as bait in Scotland rather than as a foodstuff in their own right.

This photograph looks as though it was taken during a local gala, most probably the Fisherman's Walk. There is a brass band resting in the background. The Fisherman's Walk celebrations are held at the beginning of September to mark the end of the Summer fishing season. Originally a friendly society, the Musselburgh Fisherman's Walk Society provided help and pensions to fishermen and their families in Fisherrow. In 1912 the Society was dissolved as fewer people were involved in fishing, or able to pay their contributions. In 1930, however, the Society was revived by Alex Craig, and since then the annual Fisherman's Walk has been preserved.

A group of fishwives 'Riding the Marches' at Musselburgh, Midlothian, 1950s.

The fishwives are 'riding the marches', that is walking to the boundaries of the town. The fishwives' gala costume usually consisted of a blouse of spun rayon printed with flowers, an underskirt of navy blue and cream striped wool, and apron of navy blue and white striped cotton, a shawl of cream wool printed with sprays of flowers, a pair of black silk stockings, a pair of black leather shoes, and a tie-on pocket of spun rayon.

Newburgh Brass Band, Newburgh, Fife, 1909.

These local children are marching along with the band as it makes its way along the street. Brass bands were particularly popular in the mining communities. Playing in a band offered a temporary relief from working, often in very unpleasant conditions, down the pits.

Brass bands often acted as symbols of pride in the town or pit. They were particularly popular during Gala Days, when local bands would enter competitions with bands from surrounding towns and villages with both prizes and prestige to be won.

Linda Lawrence was born and raised in the mining village of Newtongrange to a family of miners. She is currently employed as the senior receptionist in the National Mining Museum Scotland. In this extract she remembers her childhood experiences of the Gala Days in Newtongrange in Midlothian. She reflects on the local community today and how it has changed. The Newtongrange Gala Day was a tradition begun in 1913 and was sponsored by the Dean Tavern public house in Newtongrange, which runs on the Gothenburg system of using profits to fund community projects.

Playing sports, some less serious than others, is an integral part of most gala days in Scotland. While more serious athletic events take place, the main emphasis is placed on having fun with the holding of races like the 'three legged' race and the 'egg and spoon' race. In South Queensferry a pram race, and the climbing of the greasy pole ensures that adults are not left out of the proceedings!

In South Queensferry's pram race, adults are not left out of the proceedings! This pram, equipped with 'L plates' and a 'Long Vehicle' sign, contains an oversized 'baby' which is being hurriedly pushed along by the 'mother'.

The Ferry Fair is best known for the centuries old ceremony of the Burry Man. The burry man, an elected local, is clothed from head to foot in a special suit covered in hundreds of 'burrs' (the spiky seed cases of the burdock plant). The head of the burry man is crowned in flowers, as are the two decorated staffs that he holds whilst walking around the town.

The crowning of the Gala Queen, Woodmuir, Whitburn, West Lothian, 1928.

The Gala was a local annual festival, held in the summer. The Gala day is most commonly found in coal mining areas like this one. Children played a vital role in the proceedings of the day. The Gala Queen, Grace Graham, is being crowned by a local teacher, Miss Arnott. The two maids of honour were Maisie Kerr and Jessie Cuthbert, the surname of the pageboy was Walkinshaw.

Although today the mines in these communities have shut down, many villages and towns continue to hold their gala days and they continue to be a symbol of local pride and something that unites the community.
