

Hidden histories trail

This trail is a collaboration with young people and National Museums Scotland staff to highlight unexplored LGBTQIA+ stories across our collections. Traditionally LGBTQIA+ stories have been kept out of mainstream history, so many of these are hidden or hard to find.

We are committed to collaborating with communities to make more of these hidden histories visible. Our objects have many more diverse and important stories to tell.

1 Stained and painted glass panel showing portrait of James VI and I, 1619

Kingdom of the Scots

King James VI and I, son of Mary Queen of Scots was famous for having a succession of male 'favourites' throughout his reign, a term then sometimes used to mean a romantic partner or lover. The most well-known of these was George Villiers, the Duke of Buckingham, who was the king's favourite from around 1608 until James' death in 1625. These stained-glass windows, originally located in Wroxton Abbey in England, were made to commemorate a visit to the area by the King and his 'favourite'. Nearby you will see a silver pocket watch from around 1615. This watch was a gift given to Robert Ker, the Earl of Somerset, by King James VI/I. Robert followed James from Scotland to England in 1603 and was well-known to also have been another of the king's 'favourites'.

2 Iron collar or jogs,
Fife, 17th century
Kingdom of the Scots

Iron collars like these were used to punish women accused of witchcraft. The persecution of so called 'witches' became more common in Scotland during the early 16th to mid 18th centuries. Women living outside the bounds of normal society, for example being unmarried or cohabiting with another woman, were often regarded with suspicion, and sometimes accused of witchcraft.

One account from the 17th century reports the case of Maud Galt, who was accused of being a lesbian by her maid. This later became 'evidence' of her being a witch, and the state decided to replace the charge of lesbianism with that of witchcraft. The fact that the two were so interconnected speaks volumes about how homosexuality was perceived at the time.

3 Alexander McQueen Boots,
Leather and Mink, 2012
Fashion and Style

These hoof like heel-less boots with horse shoes in the sole were worn down the Paris catwalk as part of the Alexander McQueen Autumn/Winter 2012/13 collection. Two years previously, Alexander McQueen had died by suicide shortly after the death of his mum. After his death his assistant Sarah Burton took on his previous role as Creative Director at Alexander McQueen. The embellishments on these boots and their intricate details are typical of McQueen's creative and daring designs. Alexander McQueen was openly gay and HIV positive and famously said in Vogue magazine "I went straight from my mother's womb onto the gay parade".

Level 3

4 Enigma encoding machine,
German, 1944 Communicate

Decoding messages sent by German submarines from an Enigma machine made a huge contribution to the Allied Forces winning the second world war. Mathematics Cambridge graduate Alan Turing (1912–1954) was central to this, working alongside others at Bletchley Park to build the Bombe, a machine which could decode Enigma messages. Turing earned an O.B.E for the Bombe, and was a prominent figure in computer science and the study of artificial intelligence.

In 1952 Turing was accused of 'gross indecency' for being in a homosexual relationship, and forced to undergo chemical castration to avoid prison. In 1954, he died as a result of cyanide poisoning. Whether this was an accident or suicide is much debated.

In 1967 'male homosexual acts' were decriminalized, and Turing has quite rightly been exonerated of his so-called 'crime'. Turing received a posthumous royal pardon in 2013.

5 Ceramic dish, by Emmanuel Cooper, 1998
Making and Creating

Emmanuel Cooper was born in 1938 and worked as a potter and writer. In the 1970s Cooper became involved in the gay rights movement and helped found the Gay Left Collective, a journal of left leaning activism. He built a supportive network of gay artists and remained an active gay rights campaigner throughout his life. This dish is a clear example of Cooper's use of volcanic textures, an affect achieved through use of heavy glazing.

6 Statue of St Sebastian, painted oak, German, c. 1480–1490
Art of Living

Saint Sebastian was born in 256 AD and was an early Christian martyr and saint. He was presumed dead after the Emperor Diocletian ordered him to be tied to a post and shot through with arrows, however he survived the ordeal and was later killed by being beaten to death. Saint Sebastian has often been portrayed by artists as a beautiful young man, in an idealized, erotic manner. Since the 19th century, he has been considered a gay icon and there have been many homoerotic representations of him by artists.

7 Painted scroll, Japan, c.1700
Exploring East Asia

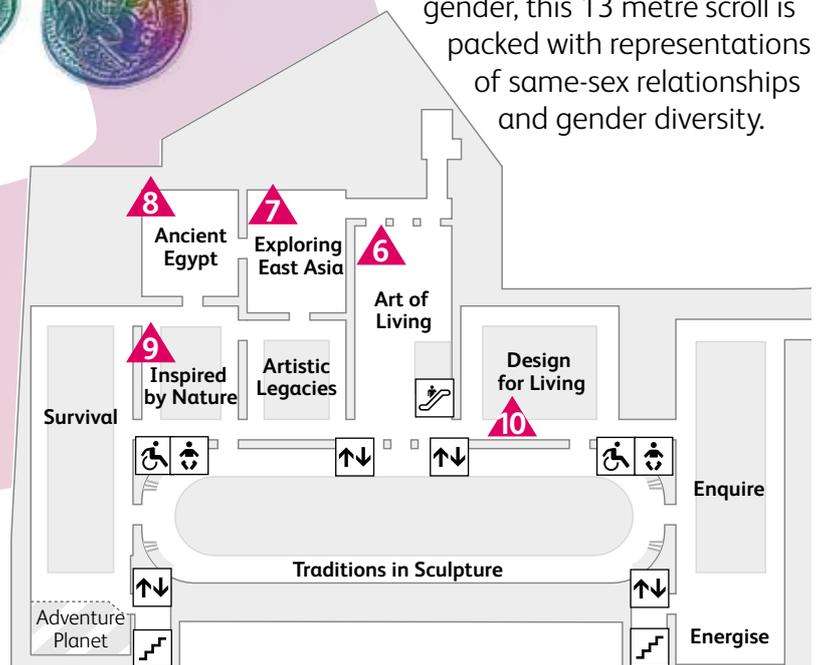

Hand drawn by Furuyama Moromasa, this representation of the Theatre District of Edo is one of the clearest depictions of hidden explorations of same-sex attraction/relationships and gender that the museum has to offer. From the performers of Kabuki Theatre to the Wakashu, a recognised and well-respected group that identified by a third gender, this 13 metre scroll is packed with representations of same-sex relationships and gender diversity.

8 Silver coins from the reign of Alexander the Great, c.325–285 BC
Ancient Rediscovered

These coins are some of 26 minted during the reign of Alexander the Great, Emperor of Ancient Greece. Alexander received his title due to his many decades of victory. He was undefeated in battle and the youngest emperor of his age, at only twenty years old.

Ancient Greeks largely accepted that it was possible to be physically attracted to persons of either sex, which in modern terms could be considered bisexual or pansexual. However, his sexuality was not remarked upon by writers of the time, as certain same-sex relationships were expected of aristocratic and powerful men. Alexander has become a gay icon in modern times, with books, films and art portraying his potential relationships.

Amphora showing Hercules and the Amazons, Ancient Greek, c.550–500 BC Inspired by Nature

This two-handled pot, known as an amphora, was probably used to store wine. It shows the Greek hero Herakles (called Hercules by the Romans) and the Amazons on one side, and two archers on the other. Popular stories about Herakles tell of his having sexual relationships with both men and women. The mythical Amazons were a closed society of female warriors and hunters, who today have become lesbian icons.

Embroidery, by May Morris c.1900 Design for Living

May Morris (1862–1938) was an embroidery designer, teacher, jeweler and editor. Her father was William Morris the Victorian textile designer, poet, Socialist and novelist. May inherited the Morris family home, Kelmscott Manor in rural Southern England. In 1916 she invited her gardener Mary Lobb to move in with her where they lived together for the next 22 years enjoying their shared passions for nature, travel and wildlife. When May died she left the bulk of the estate and most of her personal items to Mary.

CREATIVE PATHWAYS

During 2019–2020, participants with the Impact Arts Creative Pathways +18 employability programme worked alongside National Museums Scotland to create this trail and audio guide.

The young people selected objects, researched stories and developed the trail content, supported by NMS.

This is only the beginning of our work exploring LGBTQIA+ histories in our collections, with more to come over time.

With thanks to Impact Arts participants Dylan, Ivy, Hannah, and Stuart.

Additional thanks to Gareth and Laura from NMS, and to the LGBT Youth Scotland Consultation Group (Finn, Tom, Ivy, Zoel, Wren and Simon) and members of our Scotland 365 Youth Engagement Team.

LGBTQIA+ is term used to show the different ways people define their gender and sexuality, including lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, queer, intersex and asexual. Language and definitions are constantly evolving, but this is the version of this umbrella term we have chosen.
